

The Costa Maya is Mexico's Next Big Beach Destination

The Costa Maya, a 60-mile long stretch of unspoiled beach along Mexico's Caribbean coast, is now being developed into Mexico's next important tourist destination.

Oct. 26, 2009 - PRLog -- Following the Mexican Government's plan for sustainable and eco-friendly development real estate developers are now beginning to build residential projects and boutique eco-chic hotels in the Costa Maya. And with an airport under development in Tulum, the Costa Maya will soon be a lot more accessible to international tourists.

The Costa Maya is located south of both bustling Cancun and the Riviera Maya, along the sparkling Caribbean Sea. It is home to myriad wildlife and is a nesting ground for sea turtles. Inhabited in ancient times by Mayans one can now explore numerous Mayan ruins in the area. Costa Maya's cruise ship dock, located in the town of Mahahual, currently attracts more than one million visitors a year. And just offshore from the Costa Maya is Banco Chinchorro, home to some of the best-preserved scuba diving sites in the world.

"The Costa Maya is about to take off as a major tourist destination. All the necessary factors are in place in there: gorgeous beaches, perfect weather and the Mexican Government's sustainable development plan." says Frank Torres, of AIGH Mexico, a developer currently working in the Costa Maya.

Right in the heart of the Costa Maya the resort-style community of Boca Del Mar is currently being developed by AIHG Mexico. Boca Del Mar will be located just south of the town of Mahahual. This gated community will feature 400 home sites, putting greens, tennis courts, swimming pools and a nature reserve.
